“Moving forward in Aboriginal Health Research - from information to action”

Join us on Friday, August the 28th to hear Mick Gooda, the CEO of the Cooperative Research Centre for Aboriginal Health talk about the organisation and then lead an open discussion to explore best practice tools and potential pathways for researchers and industry working together with the Aboriginal community to improve the conduct and transferability of Aboriginal Health Research.

When: Friday August 28th
11.30am – 1.30pm
Where: BankWest Theatrette
Light refreshments will be served

About the Cooperative Research Centre for Aboriginal Health

The Cooperative Centre for Aboriginal Health (CRCAH) is a virtual organisation that brings together the Aboriginal health sector, government health agencies and research institutions to ensure that research conducted into Aboriginal health is driven by priorities set by Aboriginal people, is of practical use and transferred quickly, and results in the development of research capacity within the Aboriginal community itself. The CRCAH is funded by the Australian Government Cooperative Research Centre (CRC) Programme which links researchers with industry to focus efforts on research that can be readily used.

About Mick Gooda

Mick Gooda is a descendent of the Gangulu people of central Queensland and the Chief Executive Officer of the CRCAH. Mick’s extensive work history in the public and community sectors, has involved the delivery of policy and program development and advocacy in Indigenous affairs throughout Australia. He possesses a comprehensive experience of working and delivering results in remote, rural and urban environments, based on an extensive knowledge of the diversity of circumstance and cultural nuances of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples throughout Australia.

PLEASE RSVP: C.Sams@curtin.edu.au by Monday 24th August (for catering purposes)